Technical Field The present invention relates to management of resource allocation in a distributed environment. In particular, this invention relates to a method and apparatus for allocating a common resource to a plurality of tasks distributed across a number of client nodes based on client characteristics. 2. Description of Related Art Resource allocation involves the allocation of resources, for example, time, medium, space, money, or manpower, among a number of tasks. In particular, resource allocation involves allocating particular resources to a set of tasks as required to satisfy overall objectives. Generally, a set of tasks involves a number of jobs that need to be completed by a given resource. The various different tasks can be distributed across a plurality of distributed client nodes in order to obtain the benefit of hardware and software redundancy. In a distributed environment, there is a need to carefully manage the allocation of resources in order to maximize the benefit of the resource and minimize the cost of its allocation. In order to increase the benefit of a distributed resource, resources need to be allocated in a way that enables the highest priority tasks to be completed by the resource with minimum impact on other, lower priority tasks. Traditionally, resource allocation methods are based on knowledge of the characteristics of the tasks to be completed and of the allocation of resources. These traditional methods provide an approximation of an optimal allocation and thus require significant computation time and space. The overall cost of resource allocation can be determined by measuring the degree of impact on the resource that results from the allocation of resources. This impact can be measured in a number of ways, including monitoring the response times or other characteristics of each task as well as overall system performance. Optimal resource allocation
