Pages Tuesday, March 31, 2016 In March for Age Plus By Kitty Hollins A new spin on the old age-plus craze is gaining ground at universities in Arizona, Maryland, New Jersey and New York. Students are taking new classes online designed to connect with the elderly and adults with intellectual or physical disabilities. "Older adults are largely missing from the educational system," says Nyun Shik Chang, assistant professor of gerontology at New York University's Steinhardt School of Culture, Education and Human Development, and co-author of "Psychology of Ageing: Social and Individual Perspectives" (Wiley, 2014). "These courses allow us to bridge that gap and engage older adults in our community." The courses developed by Professor Chang and her colleagues offer programming for adults of all ages, from middle school to older adults. These include an online course, Computer and Aging, which draws on students' experience with computers, and an online course called Is It Me Or... Grandpa? that uses videos and audio interviews with "grandpa-like" actors. Computer and Aging is the first online course for adults developed by the Steinhardt faculty of gerontology in collaboration with the Center for Digital Scholarship at NYU's School of Continuing and Professional Studies. "We're trying to provide information to students and adults that will give them access to the types of classes that the school offers," says Professor Chang. "There are classes like Psych 101, but we wanted to provide a bridge for students by making something specifically for older people," she says. The course is available at www.steinhardt.nyu.edu/online/live/courses/20160323161528. The course will take place on Friday, April 3, at 11 a.m. Eastern Time. "The goal for Computer and Aging is to introduce students to the technology that they are using on a daily basis, from a new stereo system to the iPhone," explains Chang. "We're also going to introduce how the Internet functions, and we're going to take a look at the variety of online communities — such as Facebook and
