The FreeStyle Libre system (FSL-1) is a non-invasive system that allows continuous monitoring of blood glucose. Despite its increasing popularity, little is known about the clinical implementation of the system in the emergency department (ED). An observational study was conducted to evaluate the feasibility, accuracy, sensitivity, and specificity of the FSL system in the pediatric ED. The study compared measured and reported blood glucose (BGL) in two overlapping 10-minute periods in children aged 1 to 16 years who presented to the ED, and were not deemed "critical." In the first phase of data collection, FSL users compared their measured BGL with the true value. The second phase collected data without user intervention. In phase 1, the FSL system successfully measured blood glucose in 94% of children; however, only 54% of FSL users had attempted to compare their measured blood glucose with the true value. In the second phase, the proportion of measurements concordant with reference values increased to 88% and 77% among users who had and had not previously compared their measured BGL with the true value, respectively. The FSL system was generally reliable and accurate in the pediatric ED, despite the fact that nearly half of the users did not compare their measured blood glucose with the true value. The one-way bias among users suggests that measuring blood glucose from the FSL may be cognitively more challenging than simply taking a reference BGL. However, 87% of the children with a reported BGL were hypoglycemic or hyperglycemic, and 73% of patients who underwent treatment were hypoglycemic or hyperglycemic in the observation period. FSL users generally
