Women have higher levels of depressive symptoms than men, but whether this higher prevalence is due to a combination of greater vulnerability and fewer effective coping strategies remains unclear. This study examined the sex differences in reported depressive symptoms, as well as the association between sex and coping strategies. It also examined the mediating effects of positive affect, life satisfaction, and personality traits on the sex difference in depressive symptoms. The study sample was 10,406 students from a national community sample. Self-reported data were gathered from them with a set of self-report questionnaires. Women had higher levels of depressive symptoms and received less psychological health care than men. Sex differences in coping strategies were small to moderate. Positive affect, life satisfaction, and personality traits each had an indirect effect on the sex difference in depressive symptoms through coping strategies. Women reported significantly more depressive symptoms compared to men. The absence of sex differences in the direction of relationships were found in the models related to coping strategies, positive affect, life satisfaction, and personality traits. A combination of vulnerability and ineffective coping strategies may account for the higher prevalence of depressive symptoms in women. Findings can inform interventions aimed at alleviating the sex difference in depressive symptoms, and coping strategies are recommended as a mechanism through which to achieve this.
