Review of Tacrolimus Augmentation After Liver Transplantation. The challenge of maintaining a functional liver allograft and treating immunosuppression-induced adverse effects are important in the care of patients after liver transplantation. Tacrolimus is the most widely used calcineurin inhibitor for immunosuppression after liver transplantation. Although tacrolimus is effective in preventing acute rejection after liver transplantation, it has become a standard drug for prevention of rejection in patients with or at risk for developing chronic allograft dysfunction. Furthermore, tacrolimus has a number of associated adverse effects, including nephrotoxicity and neurotoxicity. Other immunosuppressive agents are commonly used in patients after liver transplantation. Sirolimus, mycophenolate, and steroids have been shown to be effective at inducing and maintaining immunosuppression while simultaneously minimizing the adverse effects associated with immunosuppression. In addition, newer immunosuppressive agents
