given the uncontested importance of historiography of philosophy, particularly for the historiography of philosophy, one might ask, what the point of this special issue is. the simple answer is that not all historians of philosophy are historiographers. some historians of philosophy, however, occupy a fascinating position, neither exactly a traditional historian of philosophy, nor exactly an historiographer of philosophy. we call these historians of philosophy of the second kind. they do not have a particular interest in philosophy as such, and if they write about historiography of philosophy, it is only because they are fascinated by historiography itself. the sources they make use of, however, are not secondary to philosophy, but the main sources for the history of philosophy. this may seem paradoxical. but such historians of philosophy of the second kind, whatever their titles and biographies, are those who can be called historiographical in the sense that they occupy a position that is neither completely outside the discipline of philosophy, nor is it internal to it. their work stands between history of philosophy and historiography of philosophy. they are not yet historians of philosophy and not yet historiographers of philosophy. their position is not clear-cut. the interesting part of their work is not the relations between philosophy and historiography, but the relations between philosophy and other disciplines: historiography, philology, natural history, law, etc. the structure of their work is more complex than that of traditional history of philosophy. by emphasizing their double condition, we hope to shed new light on what the historiography of philosophy actually is.

in general, the historiography of philosophy is the historiography of philosophizing as a discipline. historiography of philosophy has as its object not only philosophers but also the modes of thought which philosophers have elaborated and which philosophers have employed in their attempts to understand and explain things. historiography of philosophy is not limited to the history of philosophy as a discipline, but includes also the history of thought as a discipline. historiography of philosophy is not a historical study of philosophers and their ideas. it is a historical study of philosophical method, the philosophical method used to uncover the past, and to provide insight into our conceptual and intellectual frameworks as they have developed through time. by exploring the history of philosophizing as a discipline, we try to reach a better understanding of the history of philosophy as a discipline. in this way, the task of the historian of philosophy is to provide an account of the discipline as it has been, in order to show why it is as it is, and to explain why it is the way it is. the historian of philosophy is not a philosopher. the task of historiography as a discipline is often confused with that of historiography as a form of writing. yet, the two tasks are quite distinct. historiography as a discipline aims to uncover the past, whereas historiography as a form of writing aims to reveal the past. the historian of philosophy might be engaged in a historical study of philosophers, the history of philosophy as a discipline, or a historical study of philosophy as a discipline, the history of philosophizing as a discipline. but even when the historian of philosophy is engaged in a historical study of philosophy, he or she is not necessarily writing the history of philosophy. the historiography of philosophy as a discipline is historical, but the historiography of philosophy as a form of writing is a form of historiography. 5ec8ef588b
